Learning to Live with the Vibrations

The earthquake swarm that hit San Ramon in late January to early February finally calmed down, but it leads to two questions: Is San Ramon the most earthquake-prone city? And what country has the most earthquakes?

The first answer is, not really, although in the U.S. California is far ahead of all other states. A look at the map of recent earthquakes shows about as many in the vicinity of The Geysers, which is geothermal center. As for the second, it depends on whom you ask, and what size earthquake you're talking about. For small quakes, according to the U.S. Geological Survey (USGS), Japan and Indonesia are generally recognized as the leaders. Another source says that, as far as quakes greater than 4.0 in 2026, Mexico is in the lead with 295 as of mid-February, followed by Indonesia, with 249; Russia, with 168; and the Philippines, with 166. Japan, in fifth place, had 149 and China was in ninth place with 58. The united States was in 24th place, with 25.

So the folks in the Tri-Valley will have to get used to being in a somewhat shaky place, but not one especially prone to disasters. I suspect that will be OK with them.
How up-to-date is your Kit?

When was the last time you checked the condition of the supplies in your earthquake kit? The food you have put away will not last forever in storage; it's a good idea to check the expiration dates. Eat any of the food that's getting old and replace it.

学会与震动共处

从一月下旬到二月上旬袭击圣拉蒙的地震群终于平息了，但这引出了两个问题：圣拉蒙是地震最多的城市吗？哪个国家的地震最多？

第一个问题的答案是：并非如此。虽然在美国，加利福尼亚州的地震数量远远领先于其他各州。查看近期地震分布图可以发现，在地热中心盖瑟斯（The Geysers）附近发生的地震数量也差不多。至于第二个问题，则取决于你问的是谁，以及你指的是多大规模的地震。根据美国地质调查局（USGS）的数据，就小型地震而言，日本和印度尼西亚通常被认为位居前列。另有消息来源称，就2026年震级大于4.0级的地震数量而言，截至二月中旬，墨西哥以295次位居第一，其次是印度尼西亚249次；俄罗斯168次；菲律宾166次。日本位列第五，为149次；中国位列第九，为58次。美国排在第24位，为25次。

因此，三谷地区的居民可能需要习惯生活在一个多少有些摇晃的地方，但并不是一个特别容易发生灾难的地区。我猜他们对此应该可以接受。

A BELATED SENTIMENT

In preparing this month's newsletter, I realized that a message meant the summer of 2025 did not make it into our publication. This was an oversight on my part while I was away, and I want to sincerely apologize for the delay. Joan's words of gratitude are still deeply meaningful, and I'm grateful for the chance to share them now.

"I wish to thank everyone for their flowers, cards and condolences for my friend, Sid Smith. Many thanks to my friends who took me to visit him at the rehab place over the four months for visits and playing cards. It meant alot to me and Sid. Your kindness and prayers won't be forgotten.He was a kind and gentle person, a card player and my partner for 25 years. His family and I thank you very much for your thoughtfulness.

Thank you also to those who have been helping get things done around my home. You are heroes!"

How to Survive Your First Heart Attack

By Beth Howard, AARP

When your heart is in danger, every second counts. Take these steps to identify the symptoms and make it to the hospital in time

Every 34 seconds, someone in the U.S. has a heart attack. Every 60 seconds, someone dies of one. What sufferers do — or don't do — in the critical first moments can be the difference between life and death.

Now cardiologists are turning to the next big challenge: helping the nearly 40 percent of heart attack victims who never make it to the hospital. Many of them — 120,000 a year — will die, largely because they didn't seek help in time.

"It's a huge problem and a major unrealized opportunity," says Steven E. Nissen, M.D., chairman of cardiovascular medicine at the Cleveland Clinic. "People will still sit at home and take antacids because they think it's indigestion, or say, 'This can't happen to me because I'm a woman.' "

Here's what you can do to increase your odds of surviving a heart attack.

STEP1

Recognize the (less typical) symptoms

Men and women with a type of heart disease called atherosclerosis have a buildup of fat and cholesterol, or plaque, in the arteries. A heart attack occurs when a piece of that plaque breaks off and forms a clot that blocks blood flow to the heart muscle. The classic signs are chest pain; pain or discomfort in one or both arms, the back, the shoulders, the neck or the stomach (above the belly button — pain here is sometimes mistaken for indigestion); and shortness of breath. Sweating, nausea and vomiting are also common.

Yet studies find that as many as a third of heart attack patients have no chest pain. These patients are more likely to be older, female or diabetic. In fact, "the older you are, the more likely you are to have atypical symptoms," Nissen says. Research shows that as people age, they don't always experience chest or arm pain, sweating, nausea and vomiting. Instead, they're more apt to experience confusion and labored breathing, and to faint.

That's because as the coronary artery closes, the heart starts pumping less blood through the body. "With the stiffer blood vessels that older people typically have, they don't get enough blood flow to the brain, and pass out," Nissen says. "They wake up on the floor with vague chest pressure."

In general, symptoms may come on gradually, be hard to pin down, and stop and then start again. It's not uncommon to feel unwell days or weeks earlier. According to new data from Linköping University in Sweden, published in the Journal of Cardiovascular Nursing, people ages 32 to 74 who had had a heart attack were more likely to have visited the doctor in the week prior to the event than those who hadn't.

That's why Harlan M. Krumholz, M.D., a cardiologist and health care researcher at the Yale University School of Medicine, says to stay alert even when you're simply not feeling yourself: "If something feels really different from what you've experienced in the past, don't ignore it."

If you are alone, ask yourself: If someone else had your symptoms, would you urge that person to call for help? If the answer is yes, call.

STEP 2

Get Off the Internet and call 911

You need to get to the hospital within an hour to ensure the best outcome. "Time is muscle," Nissen says. "The earlier we intervene, the less damage to the heart, the better the chance for survival and the better the quality of life. The people who develop heart failure are the ones who get there too late."

Yet studies show that people often deny what their bodies are telling them and delay making the call. Some people waste precious minutes looking up their symptoms online; others decide to call their primary care doctor for guidance.

Patients with chronic conditions such as diabetes or chronic obstructive pulmonary disease may assume that these other health problems are to blame for their discomfort. "They wait for their medications to take effect to see if it makes a difference," says Angelo Alonzo, a research scientist at the Yale University School of Nursing who has studied heart attacks for 40 years.

The way to get past these self-imposed roadblocks: Tell your spouse, your children or a neighbor what's going on. "Others will give you the encouragement to call for help or take over for you," Krumholz says. If you are alone, ask yourself: If someone else had your symptoms, would you urge that person to call for help? If the answer is yes, call.

A regular, uncoated aspirin (not a baby aspirin) thins the blood and interferes with blood clotting.

STEP 3

What to do while you're waiting

Before the emergency medical technicians (EMTs) arrive, chew and swallow a regular, uncoated 325-milligram aspirin (not a baby aspirin), which thins the blood and interferes with blood clotting. It probably won't stop a heart attack, but it may limit the damage.

If you are able, unlock the doors, then rest. "Call someone to come over and wait with you," Krumholz says, "or talk with someone on the phone until help arrives."

Don't drive yourself to the hospital or have someone drive you. Ambulances have defibrillators in case your heart stops, as well as clot-busting medications, so EMTs may be able to start treatment before you get to the hospital. "If something goes south, they can deal with it," Krumholz says. "Equally important, they smooth the path for you. If you come in the front door, [hospital personnel] haven't had time to prepare for your arrival and you may have to wait for the cath lab team to assemble."

EMTs will also know the best cardiac center to take you to, founder of the Women's Heart Clinic at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn. "The nearest hospital may be five minutes away," she says, "but the one best equipped to open up your arteries may be 15 minutes away."

If having heart attack symptoms, you need to get to the hospital within an hour to ensure the best outcome.

STEP 4

Say the right things

When EMTs arrive, focus on describing your symptoms and any risk factors. Be prepared to tell people what medications you're on, or bring a list with you. "If someone is taking Viagra, we need to know," Krumholz says. Viagra and some other medications for erectile dysfunction cannot be taken with nitroglycerin, which is typically given during a heart attack, as the combination can trigger a potentially life-threatening reaction.

Some studies suggest that it's harder for EMTs to recognize heart attack symptoms in women because they are less likely to have classic symptoms such as chest pain. If EMTs don't zero in on your heart right away and you're concerned, it's OK to say, "I think I'm having a heart attack."

Some people believe that if you say you're having chest pain, you'll get faster attention. It's more important to be honest, Krumholz says. Still, if you're having chest pain, mention that symptom upfront.

STEP 5

Be assertive

Studies suggest that how you are perceived can make a difference in how you're treated. In research from the McGill University Health Centre in Montreal, men and women who were shy or reticent waited longer for treatment, says study author Roxanne Pelletier. Try to be assertive, and don't play down your symptoms. If you say, "Oh, it's probably just heartburn," your condition may not be taken as seriously.

There is no shame if your symptoms turn out to be a false alarm. "Don't worry about looking foolish or bothering people," Krumholz says. "To catch all heart attacks, we're going to have some people come in when there's nothing wrong."

New Heart Tests

Better tests for detecting a heart attack in progress or for screening for future risk are in the pipeline.

A test with higher sensitivity
Scottish researchers have come up with a blood test that can detect far lower levels of troponin — a protein released when heart muscle is damaged — than those currently available. In a study published in the Lancet, the test identified low troponin levels in about two-thirds of people who were hospitalized with symptoms, indicating they were at such low risk for a heart attack that they were eligible for an earlier hospital discharge.

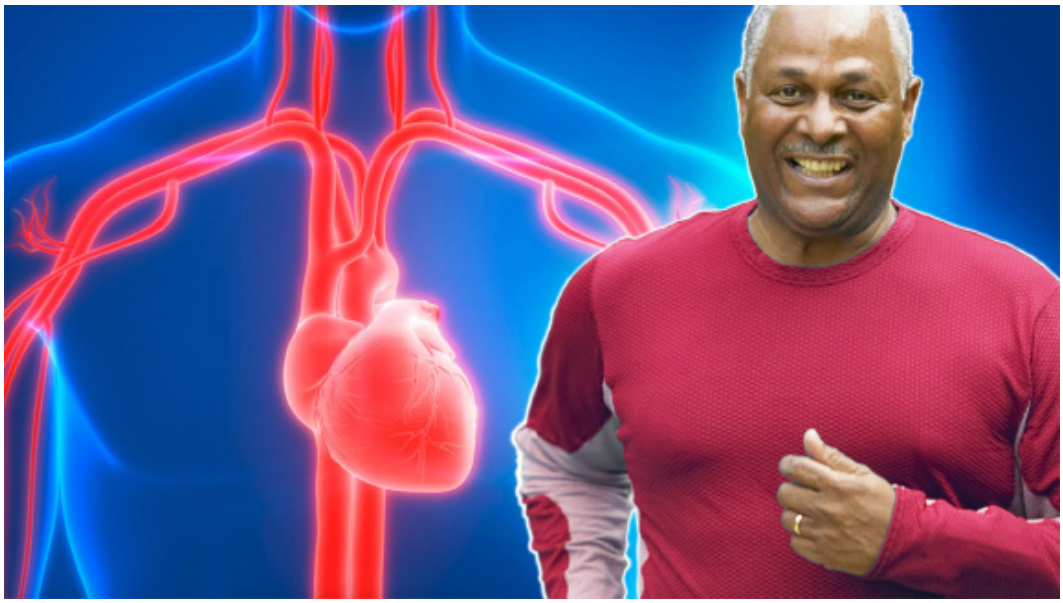

An improved troponin testing device
Currently, detection of troponin requires bulky instruments available only in a well-equipped hospital. But a South Korean team has recently developed a thermometer-like device that could make determining heart damage almost as easy as taking someone's temperature. It tests a drop of a person's blood using nanoparticles sensitized to troponin antibodies. Years of testing lie ahead, however, before this will be available.

A screening tool

Cleveland Clinic researchers have found that a by-product of intestinal bacteria can increase a person's chances of having a heart attack. The chemical by-product, called trimethylamine N-oxide (TMAO), can be detected in blood and accurately predicts a person's risk for future cardiac events such as a heart attack or stroke. More testing is needed before screening for TMAO becomes a routine part of care.
What to expect in the hospital

When a heart attack is confirmed, patients usually undergo balloon angioplasty to open up the blocked artery and restore blood flow to the heart. The doctor threads a catheter, with a small inflatable balloon on the tip, through an artery near your groin or wrist and then to the site of the blockage. Next, the balloon is inflated, compressing the plaque against the artery wall to allow blood to flow. Typically, a tube of stainless steel mesh, called a stent, is then inserted into the artery to prop it open.

After the procedure and a day or more to recuperate, you'll leave the hospital with follow-up instructions and prescriptions to help reduce the chances of a second heart attack. You should also be referred for cardiac rehabilitation, a supervised program that includes physical activity, social support and education to encourage healthful behaviors.

COMMUNITY ANNOUNCEMENT

missed our February newsletter because our publisher's printing press had an unexpected breakdown that took longer than anyone hoped to fix. The good news is that everything is fully up and running again, and they've confirmed we'll be back on our regular schedule starting in May.

In the meantime, we didn't want you to miss out on articles we had planned for February. Some of the most important articles from that issue have been added to the April newsletter.

Thank you for your patience while we worked through this little bump in the road.

In our March newsletter, I shared that I would be stepping down as editor. I'm excited to announce that Alexandra will be stepping into the role as the new editor of our community newsletter! A resident with a passion for local stories, Alexandra brings a strong commitment to keeping neighbors informed and connected. We're looking forward to the fresh energy and ideas she'll bring to each issue.

A quick chat with Alexandra:

Q: How long have you lived in the community?

A: I've been here full time since 2021 though I've visited a few times before while staying with my now-husband, so the community already felt like home before I officially moved in.

Q*: Where did you live before?*

A: I grew up in Ireland and also lived in the UK and Dubai for a few years. I have moved around quite a bit., which gave me a real appreciation for what makes a community feel welcoming and safe.

Q: What is something you appreciate living here?

A: The mix of people. Different backgrounds, different stories, but a genuine sense of neighborhood. That is something worth protecting and building on.

Q: Are there any types of stories or updates you especially enjoy sharing?

A: Anything that helps people feel safer, more informed, and more connected. I have a background in security and IT, so I am especially drawn to updates that help residents know what is going on around them and how to look out for each other.

Q: What do you hope the newsletter helps people feel or learn?

A: I want people to feel informed, included, and part of something. My goal is to keep what already works well about the newsletter while gradually making it something even more people look forward to reading. A more open, equitable, and safer community starts with people actually talking to each other, and a good newsletter helps make that happen.
