VIEU NEWS

BY PETER CLEAVELAND

Danger From Beneath the Sea

The news as of late has been full of stories about a future event in (actually under) the Pacific Ocean, off the California/Oregon/Washington coast.

It's about the Cascadia Subduction Zone, which we have talked about in the past. It's an area some 600 miles long, stretching from Canada's Vancouver Island to the northern Bay Area. "It is," according to Wikipedia, "a very long, sloping subduction zone where the Explorer, Juan de Fuca, and Gorda plates move to the east and slide below the much larger mostly continental North American plate." The sliding action isn't necessarily smooth, and may get stuck for decades or centuries, while stress builds up in the rock layers. Eventually it lets go, and creates both intense earth shaking (up to magnitude 9 is estimated) and a huge (up to 100 feet high) tsunami that ravages the West Coast.

A recent article in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences suggests another consequence: a permanent sinking or subsidence of large areas of the coast "anywhere from a half foot to 6 feet along coastal areas between southern Washington and Humboldt Bay." This would greatly increase the danger in those areas of flooding due to storm surges and sea level rise.

The last time the Cascadia Subsidence Zone generated a tsunami was in the year 1700, as shown in Japanese records, and eventually it will happen again. The problem is that no one knows when that will be.

VIEU 新闻

来自海底的危险

最近的新闻中充满了关于太平洋（实际上是在太平洋之下）的一项未来事件的报道，地点位于加利福尼亚州、俄勒冈州和华盛顿州沿岸。

这与我们以前谈到过的喀斯喀特俯冲带（Cascadia Subduction Zone）有关。这是一个大约600英里长的区域，从加拿大的温哥华岛一直延伸到加州北部湾区。"根据维基百科的说法，这是一个非常长、倾斜的俯冲带，探索者板块（Explorer）、胡安·德富卡板块（Juan de Fuca）和戈尔达板块（Gorda）向东移动并滑到更大、主要是大陆性的北美板块之下。"

这种滑动动作并不一定是平滑的，可能会被卡住几十年甚至几个世纪，期间岩层中的应力不断积累。最终，这些应力会突然释放，造成剧烈的地震（估计可能高达9级）以及巨大的海啸（高达100英尺），对西海岸造成严重破坏。

《美国国家科学院院刊》最近的一篇文章提出了另一个可能的后果：从华盛顿州南部到洪堡湾之间的沿海地区，大片沿海区域可能会永久性下沉，沉降幅度可能从半英尺到6英尺不等。这将大大增加这些地区在风暴潮和海平面上升背景下的洪水风险。

根据日本的记录，喀斯喀特俯冲带上一次引发海啸是在1700年。未来它还会再次发生，问题在于，没有人知道具体会在什么时候发生。

The Top 10 Most Common Chronic Conditions in Older Adults

By The National Council on Aging

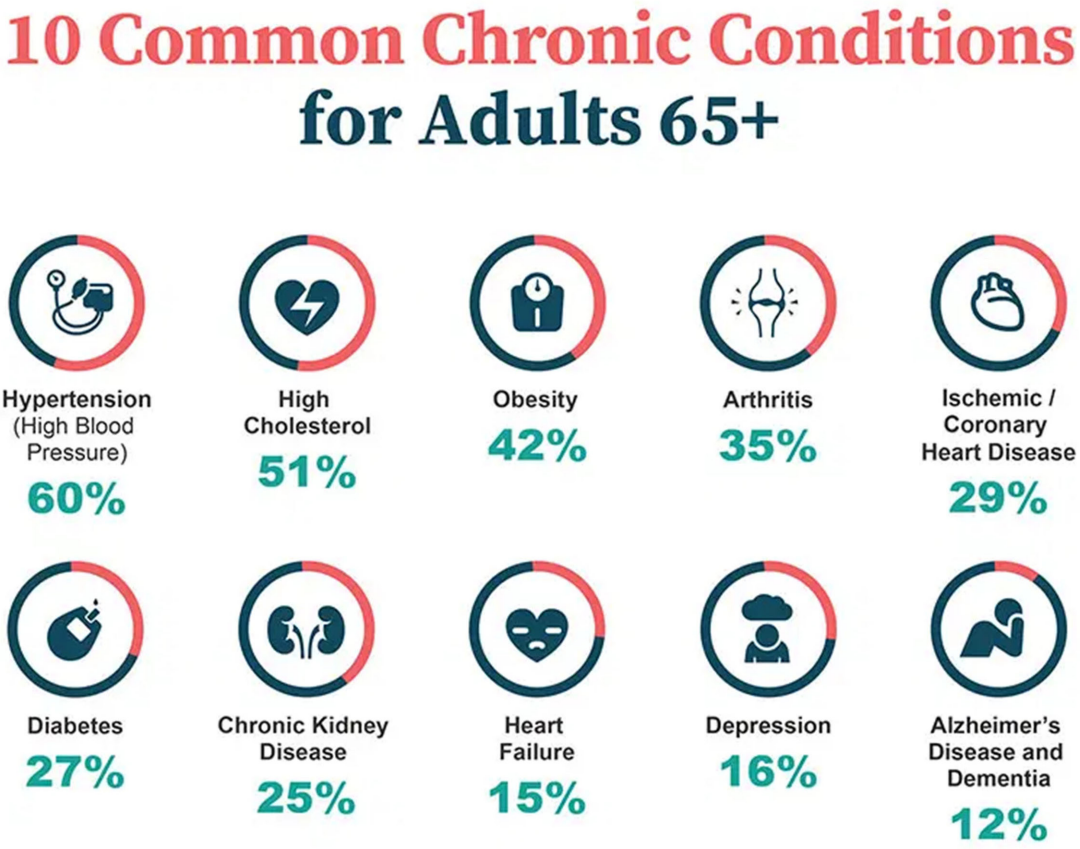

Age, family genetics, and gender make it nearly impossible for older adults to avoid becoming a chronic disease statistic. According to NCOA research, 94.9% percent of adults age 60 and older have at least one condition, while 78.7% have two or more.1 You probably have a parent or grandparent who is managing a condition right now, or perhaps you are managing one yourself.

And obesity, which impacts about 42% of adults 60 and older,2 can increase your risk for conditions like heart disease, type 2 diabetes, and some cancers.3

With these kinds of odds, you might wonder if there is anything you can do to prevent the onset of a chronic medical condition, or make managing an existing one easier. The answer is yes.

Here are 10 common chronic conditions adults 65+ on Medicare were treated for in 2018,4 and what you should know about each.

Number 10: Alzheimer's disease and dementia

Nearly 12% of older adults on Medicare were treated for Alzheimer's disease or another form of dementia. Alzheimer's disease is one specific type of dementia—a condition that causes memory loss and difficulty thinking or problem-solving to the point that it interferes with every day activities. Dementia is not a normal part of aging and is caused by changes in the brain over time.

The biggest risk factors for these chronic conditions are things you often can't control, including age, family history, and genetics.

But studies have suggested incorporating the following habits into your lifestyle could slow or prevent onset:

Exercise. Staying active isn't just good for your heart; it's also great for your brain.

Sleep. Your brain does important stuff while you are sleeping, so getting at least 7 hours of deep sleep a night is crucial.

Be smart about your diet. Research suggests that some foods can negatively affect your brain.

Number 9: Depression

Sixteen percent of older adults sought treatment for depression—a treatable medical condition that is not a normal part of aging. Depression causes persistent feelings of sadness, pessimism, hopelessness, fatigue, difficulty making decisions, changes in appetite, a loss of interest in activities, and more.

Steps you can take to help with depression include:

Manage stress levels. Reach out to family and friends during rough spells and consider regular meditation.

Eat a healthy diet. What you put into your body can affect your mood, so focus on foods that are high in nutrients and promote the release of endorphins and those "feel good" chemicals, and limit consumption of things like alcohol, caffeine, artificial sweeteners, and highly processed foods.

Routine exercise. Exercise has a number of physical and psychological benefits, including improving your mood through the release of endorphins and other "feel good" brain chemicals, boosting self-confidence and self-worth through meeting goals and improving your physical appearance, and increased socialization through interactions at gyms and group classes.

Talk to your doctor. If you've experienced any of the warning signs of depression, talk to your doctor, and ask about your treatment options. Antidepressant medications or psychotherapy could be right for you.

If you're in severe emotional distress, one of the first things you should do is tell someone else about it—such as a trusted friend or family member. You can also dial or text 988 from your phone to speak with a counselor who is specially trained in suicide prevention. The 988 service is free, confidential, and available to everyone in the United States 24 hours a day, 7 days a week.

Number 8: Heart failure

About 15% of older adults were treated for heart failure—a condition that occurs when the heart cannot adequately supply blood and oxygen to all of the organs in the body. The heart might become enlarged, develop more muscle mass, or pump faster in order to meet the body's needs, causing you to feel tired, light headed, nauseous, confused, or lack an appetite.

Steps you can take to prevent or diminish symptoms of heart failure:

The best prevention is to follow a doctor's recommendations to decrease your risk for coronary heart disease and high blood pressure.

Number 7: Chronic kidney disease (CKD)

Nearly 25% of older adults were treated for chronic kidney disease (CKD) or a slow loss in kidney function over time. People dealing with CKD have an increased risk for developing heart disease or kidney failure.

Steps you can take to prevent or diminish symptoms of CKD:

Understand what damages your kidney. Diabetes and high blood pressure are the greatest risk factors for kidney damage, so taking steps to prevent these diseases is your best strategy.

Early detection and treatment. Talk to your doctor regularly, stay current on screenings, and keep up on prescriptions you need to diminish symptoms.

Number 6: Diabetes

Twenty-seven percent of older adults were treated for diabetes—a disease that occurs when your body is resistant to, or doesn't produce enough, insulin. Insulin is what your body uses to get energy from food, and distributes it to your cells. When this doesn't happen, you get high blood sugar, which can lead to complications such as kidney disease, heart disease, or blindness. Chances of having diabetes increases after age 45.

Steps you can take to keep you from developing diabetes or to manage this condition:

Eating a healthy diet, including monitoring your carbohydrate and calorie intake, and talking to your doctor about alcohol consumption.

Exercising for 30 minutes five times a week to keep your blood glucose levels in check, and to control weight gain.

Safely losing 5-7% of body weight if you are diagnosed with pre-diabetes.

Number 5: Ischemic heart disease (or coronary heart disease)

Nearly 29% of older adults were treated for ischemic heart disease—a condition that is caused by a build-up of plaque that narrows the arteries leading to the heart. Narrow or blocked arteries decreases the amount of oxygen-rich blood delivered to the heart. This can cause other complications like blood clots, angina, or a heart attack.

Steps you can incorporate to help if you have ischemic heart disease:

Avoid saturated and trans fats, and limit sugar and salt intake

Get seven to eight hours of sleep each night

Keep your stress levels in check

Do regular cardio exercises

Abstain from smoking

Talk to your doctor about the major risk factors, including high cholesterol and high blood pressure

Number 4: Arthritis

About 35% of older adults were treated for arthritis—an inflammation of your joints, which causes pain and stiffness and is more common in women.

Steps you can take to delay the onset of arthritis or manage the symptoms:

Exercise at least five times per week, for 30 minutes each time, to improve function and decrease pain. Try to include a mixture of aerobic, strength-building, and stretching movements.

Stay within the recommended weight for your height—losing one pound can remove four pounds of pressure on your knees.

Make sure your back, legs, and arms are always supported.

Take precautions to avoid joint injuries.

Do not smoke.

Number 3: Obesity
About 40% of adults 65 and older are living with obesity, a chronic disease linked to more than 200 chronic conditions. NCOA is pressing to define quality obesity care as a universal right. That includes the right to coverage for treatment with access to the full range of treatment options.

Steps you can take to delay the onset of obesity or manage the symptoms:

Understanding what obesity treatments are covered by Medicare
Empowering yourself with knowledge about nutrition
Educating others and being your own advocate

Number 2: High cholesterol
More than 50% of older adults were treated for high cholesterol—a condition that occurs when your body has an excess of bad fats (or lipids), resulting in your arteries getting clogged, which can lead to heart disease.

Steps you can take to prevent or manage high cholesterol:

Abstain from smoking and excessive alcohol consumption
Be active each day
Manage your weight
Minimize saturated fats and trans fats in your diet

Number 1: Hypertension (high blood pressure)
Nearly 60% of older adults were treated for hypertension—a common condition that involves both how much blood your heart pumps, as well as how resistant your arteries are to the blood flow. When your heart pumps a lot of blood, and you have narrow arteries which resist the flow, that's when you get high blood pressure, also known as hypertension. The danger of hypertension is not only that you can have it for years and not know it, but it can cause other serious health conditions, like stroke and heart attacks.

Steps you can take to prevent or reduce high blood pressure:

Maintaina healthy weight. Losing just 10 pounds can reduce blood pressure
Regulate your stress levels
Limit salt and alcohol consumption
Exercise daily, including a combination of moderate to vigorous-intensity aerobic activities, flexibility and stretching, and muscle strengthening
Check your blood pressure regularly—the quicker you catch pre-hypertension, the more likely you are to prevent high blood pressure

Other common chronic conditions for older adults

Another common chronic conditions for adults 65+ is chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD), which includes two main conditions: emphysema and chronic bronchitis. COPD makes it hard to breathe and causes shortness of breath, coughing, and chest tightness.

Steps you can take to manage COPD include:

The best way to prevent COPD—or slow its progression—is to quit or avoid smoking. Also try to avoid secondhand smoke, chemical fumes, and dust, which can irritate your lungs.
If you already have COPD, complete the treatments that your doctor has prescribed, get the flu and pneumonia vaccines as recommended by your doctor, and continue to remain active.

When these tactics aren't enough to help with your chronic condition

The above tips can help you avoid or successfully manage a chronic condition. However, if you or someone you know is struggling to manage a chronic condition, there are programs in your community that can help, like the Chronic Disease Self-Management Program (CDSMP). CDSMP is a six-week, interactive, small-group workshop that helps participants build the skills necessary to control how chronic conditions affect their life.

CDSMP workshop sessions focus on the following topics:

Dealing with fatigue, pain, frustration, or isolation
Maintaining strength, flexibility, and endurance
Managing medications
Communicating with family, friends, and health professionals
Healthy eating

Cuts to Food Assistance Looming for Older Adults as 'One Big, Beautiful Bill Act' Progresses

by Deirdre van Dyk and Emily Paulin, AARP

Millions of low-income people, including many older adults, could lose access to food assistance under new federal legislation that proposes changes and funding cuts to the national Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP).

AARP is urging lawmakers to reverse course and protect the program, which helps those in need buy groceries.

A Republican plan to slash $300 billion from SNAP would, for the first time, require adults ages 55 to 64 to meet stringent work requirements and shift responsibility for financing up to 25 percent of SNAP benefits to states.

If the proposal is adopted, the 1 in 10 older adults who struggle with food insecurity could find it challenging to meet new requirements or cut through red tape to access the assistance they need. SNAP households with adults age 50 and older receive about $6 a day. Join Our Fight to Protect Older Americans

The House's Republican majority approved the changes May 22 in a wide-reaching bill that also would slash taxes and increase military and border security spending through cuts to SNAP, Medicaid and other federal programs. The bill, called the One Big, Beautiful Bill Act, now moves to the Senate.

AARP is "concerned about the deep cuts to SNAP," Nancy LeaMond, AARP's chief advocacy and engagement officer, wrote in a May 21 letter to House leadership about several key provisions in the bill. She noted that the program is "a lifeline for millions of older adults facing rising food prices and financial strain."

About 12.6 million adults ages 50 and older have limited access to nutritious food because of financial constraints. They are often hungry, cutting back on or skipping meals because they can't afford groceries.

SNAP serves low-income individuals and families, helping them buy food at grocery stores, farmers markets and some online retailers. While federal guidelines determine eligibility for the program, each state has some flexibility to set additional requirements. Generally, people qualify based on income and assets.

"With rising food prices, rising food insecurity and a growing aging population, it is more important than ever to connect eligible older adults to SNAP and other nutrition assistance programs," Bill Sweeney, AARP's senior vice president of government affairs, wrote in a May 13 letter to the House Agriculture Committee, which oversees SNAP.

Shifting the costs to states

The biggest change to the program would require states to partially pay for SNAP benefits in addition to covering more administrative costs. The federal government has paid all SNAP benefits since the program was established in 1939, while administrative costs have been shared equally with states.

Under the Republican proposal, states would pay at least 5 percent of the benefits, starting in October 2027. But that percentage would increase based on a state's error rates — when too much or too few benefits are paid to a recipient.

States with the highest error rates would have to contribute 25 percent of benefits. AARP estimates that 28 states would qualify for the highest percentage.

"This unfunded mandate on states will shift millions or billions onto state budgets that may result in downstream cuts to food assistance, making it even harder to meet the needs of older Americans who need help putting food on the table," Sweeney says.

On top of paying more for benefits, states would be on the hook for 75 percent of administrative costs, up from 50 percent.

States will be forced to make difficult decisions to absorb those new costs.

"Even shifting funding by 5 percent to the states could force the rationing or reduction of benefits. States might also be forced to change eligibility requirements, making it harder for individuals to qualify for the benefits," says Lauren Ryan, AARP government affairs director for federal food security policy.
Learn How AARP Is Fighting for You

SNAP beneficiaries currently have work requirements, but most older adults adults and people with disabilities are exempt. In the bill, adults up to age 65 could be required to work 80 hours a month, but that might not be easy. Two-thirds of workers over age 50 have seen or directly experienced age discrimination in the workforce, according to AARP surveys, and 1 in 5 feel they are being pushed out of their jobs because of age.

"We're concerned about expanding work requirements to older adults who already face higher rates of long-term unemployment and persistent age discrimination," Sweeney says, urging lawmakers to reconsider these requirements.

In addition, family caregiving work does not count toward the required work hours. Those who fail to fulfill work quotas could lose SNAP benefits for three years.

"Some older adults may already be working but with inconsistent hours or providing unpaid care," Ryan says. "They may be meeting the requirements or trying to find work but be penalized due to bureaucratic red tape."

AARP supports certain tax provisions in the One Big, Beautiful Bill Act and oppose cuts to Medicaid, Affordable Care Act marketplace health coverage and SNAP.

Drugstore Hair Products That Rival Luxury Brands

By Lois Joy Johnson, AARP

Many women wonder if luxury hair products are really any better than drugstore brands. Who wouldn't be curious when dealing with age-related thinning, dryness, a sensitive scalp, lack of volume, and cumulative damage from heat styling and chemical processes?

Nowadays the term "drugstore" is a catchall for "affordable," since hair products both low- and high-end are also available at specialty sites like Ulta Beauty, mass retailers like Target and Amazon, and even your local supermarket. Is a $36 shampoo any better than one that costs $9? Find out — and save yourself some money.

1. Nurturing, nourishing shampoos and conditioners

Premium hair brands like Augustinus Bader, Oribe and Kerastase have chic packaging and subtle scents, and they get well-earned social media raves from celebrities and hairstylists alike for rejuvenating hair. Costing between $35 and a whopping $75 per product, they're tempting, though not tempting enough for most women to pivot from more affordable brands. And there is no need, since "drugstore" hair care has leveled up following the enormous success of drugstore skin care.

At one time, scent was a significant driver in low-cost shampoos and conditioners, and it still is to some extent. Now the allure is more about rock star ingredients like hyaluronic acid, antioxidant vitamins, botanicals, sulfate and silicone, plus cruelty-free formulas and recyclable packaging. Check out three very nourishing hyaluronic acid-enhanced duos and treat your tresses to a luxury-level moisture and plumping for less than a latte: Love, Beauty and Planet Coconut

Water & Mimosa Flower Sulfate-Free Shampoo and Conditioner ($9 each, walmart.com); L'Oréal Paris Elvive Hyaluron Plump Hydrating Shampoo and Conditioner set ($12, target.com); and CeraVe Gentle Hydrating Shampoo and Conditioner ($9 each, cvs.com).

2. Volumizing styling products

When long hair wants oomph, pixies need lift and bobs crave fullness, count on low-cost products. Drugstore staples such as mousse, dry shampoo and texturizing mists are all superlight and magical for mature hair.

Yes, pricey brands like Crown Affair and Briogeo produce innovative styling products that make women question the more affordable alternatives and ask, "Am I missing out by not spending more?" Here's the truth: Low-cost stylers have gotten a much-needed makeover. There's no more crunch, a tacky, sticky feel, or residue. They don't weigh even the finest, thinnest hair down, are half the price of their luxury counterparts, and offer specialized solutions for every concern.

For example, Herbal Essences Volumizing Mousse ($6, walgreens.com) is color-safe; Kristin Ess Hair Instant Lift Volumizing Mist ($15, ulta.com) contains replenishing castor oil for damaged hair; The Mane Choice Ancient Egyptian Anti-Breakage and Repair Mousse ($15, cvs.com) is designed to freshen curls with olive and baobob oil; and Monday Haircare Volume Dry Shampoo ($8, ulta.com) is collagen-enhanced and has a subtle gardenia scent that smells like a posh designer hair mist. You can't lose.

3. Scalp treatments

Dandruff is not a glamorous category; nor is product buildup or an itchy, sensitive scalp. Solutions for these concerns are not usually prominently displayed on vanities or in the bathroom. They don't get a lot of influencer endorsements, either. But they are a major five-star niche for drugstore hair care. These shampoos, scrubs and scalp treatments are effective at banishing flakes, and they soothe and improve sensitivity literally at the root of hair problems.

Naturally, there are pricey versions of scalp exfoliators and serums, and some brands offer trial minis for less, but the most practical and effective option is to stick with drugstore brands. The choices range from thorough but gentle shampoos like Head & Shoulders Bare Soothing Hydration Silicone-Free Dandruff Shampoo ($12, cvs.com), which reduces flakes with zinc pyrithicone; circulation-stimulating scalp scrubs like Mielle Rosemary Mint Scalp Scrub ($11, walgreens.com) that reduce buildup; and pampering scalp oils like Shea Moisture Rosemary & Vegan Collagen Strengthening Scalp & Hair Oil ($11, ulta.com) to rev up circulation; and Eva & Avo Avocado Scalp Oil Treatment ($11, cvs.com) to soothe.

4. Leave-in conditioners and heat protectants

Anyone who uses a blow-dryer, curling iron, flat iron or hot rollers needs extra moisture and heat protection. That's why leave-in conditioners have changed from an "extra" to an essential for women with dry, thirsty hair. While high-tag brands like R + Co, Alterna Caviar and IGK do have leave-ins, drugstore brands rule this category with their own multitasking formulas.

To clarify: A leave-in conditioner is meant to be used in addition to regular conditioner, not instead of it. Applied to damp, freshly shampooed hair, it detangles and extends your regular conditioner's moisturizing benefits. Some leave-in conditioners are also heat protectants, others are not.

My advice? Choose formulas that do all three, like John Frieda Frizz Ease Daily Nourishment Leave-In Conditioner ($9, target.com); SGX NYC Multitasker 7-in-1 Leave-In Treatment ($10, cvs.com); and Eva NYC Mane Magic 10-in-1 Primer for Fine Hair ($15, walgreens.com). You'll also get ingredient boosts from antioxidant vitamins and botanical extracts, which reduce drying time and control frizz. It will be worth the extra two minutes it takes to apply.

5. Shine makers

Hair that shines looks healthy. Unfortunately, that naturally glossy finish diminishes with age, and chemical processing and heat styling can diminish the wow factor of even the greatest cut or color.

Products that fake a glossier, glow-boosting look are trending at every price. Expensive brands such as Moroccanoil, Bumble and Bumble and Lolavie are known for their excellent oil treatments, but these goodies range from $30 to $60. Does that mean go ahead and splurge? Not necessarily, especially now that research and development teams for affordable hair products have taken charge.

Oils, especially argan and argan blended with other oils like grapeseed and jojoba, are the big trend. Not only are they not oily to the touch (they have more of the silky feel of serums), these shine generators can also be used on dry or damp hair after shampooing. This should quash the fears of women, especially those with fine or thin hair, who shy away from oils, fearing a greasy mess.

Depending on the brand and formula, hair oils are applied like a face serum (you only need a couple of drops), or misted sparingly for an instant nongreasy sheen. Sprays like OGX Renewing + Argan Oil of Morocco Weightless Healing Dry Oil ($11, ulta.com) and serums like Pantene Miracle Rescue Regenerative Hair Oil ($14, cvs.com) and Tresemmé Lamellar Gloss Oil ($7, walgreens.com) add polish, eliminate flyaways and the frizzies, and temporarily mend split ends. For another better-than-luxury option, consider a low-cost, at-home, in-shower glossing treatment. L'Oréal Paris EverPure Sulfate Free Glossing Lamination Mask ($10, target.com) delivers impressive salon-quality results in five minutes.

6. Hair strengtheners

Anyone who colors or straightens their hair knows it feels fragile, is more prone to damage and breakage, and has low porosity. (The latter means the hair cuticle is frayed in spots, causing products to not absorb well and take longer to dry.) The premium brand Olaplex kicked off the current stronger-hair trend with its "bond-building" formula designed to repair and restore hair that's been broken down and weakened by chemical color and relaxing treatments. The concept has mushroomed as more women over 50 decide to grow their hair or keep it long.

That's because the longer (and older) the hair, the weaker and more damaged it tends to be. While Olaplex and brands like K18, Aveda and Joico continue to emphasize bond-building, they do cost between $30 to $75. Low-cost brands have joined the competition with their own restructuring shampoos and conditioners.

Great examples are SheaMoisture Amla Oil Bond Repair Conditioner ($15, walgreens.com); L'Oréal EverPure Sulfate Free Bond Strengthening Shampoo ($10, cvs.com); Pantene Pro-V Miracles Bond Repair Keratin + Vitamin E Conditioner ($10, target.com); and Garnier Fructose Hair-Filler Moisture Repair Gel-Creme ($10, ulta.com). Although the latter does not say "bond repair" on the label, that is precisely what it does.

7. Repair masks

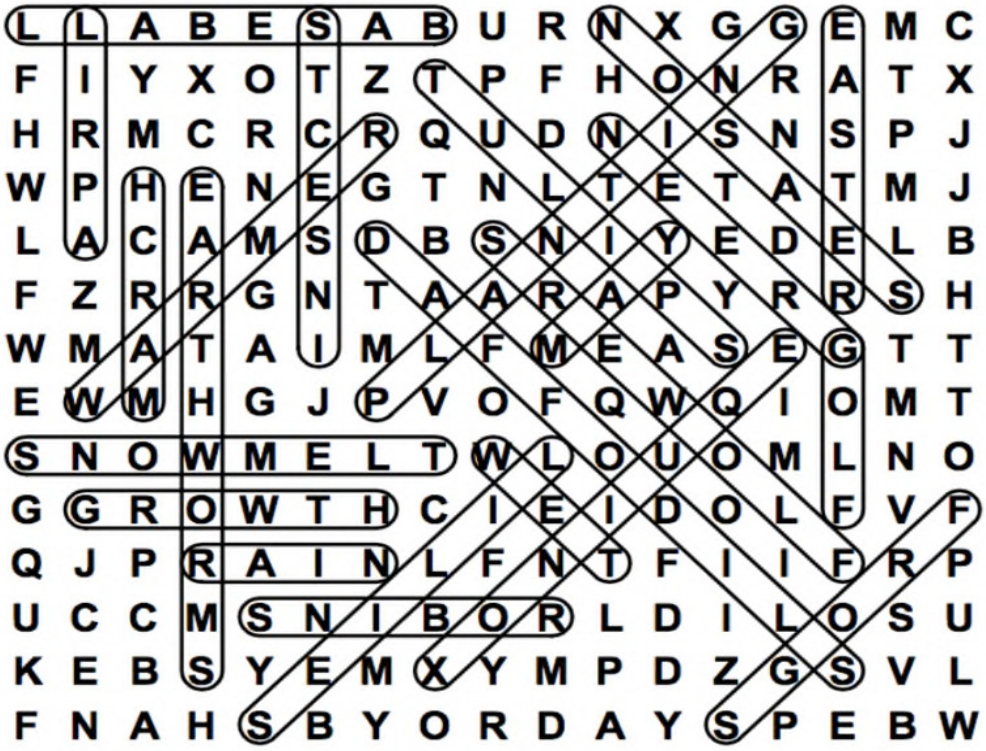

Like a conditioner on steroids, a hair mask can revive hair that looks dull, damaged, frizzy or dry. You might say, "Hair masks have always been around, so what's the big deal?" First, low-cost brands have challenged what used to be a messy, time-consuming "spa night" ritual and made hair masks a quick in-shower routine. Applied in place of a regular conditioner, they take just a few minutes to work. Expensive hair brands do, of course, continue to feature appealing creamy masks that sell from $30 to $50 or more, and like pricey shampoos and conditioners, they smell great and look cool sitting around your bathroom. But think twice.

Those you may want to try include Suave Bonding Infusion Repairing Hair Mask 1-Minute ($6, walgreens.com) with amino acids (there's that bonding benefit again!); Dove Hyaluronic + Moisture 10-in-1 Serum Hair Mask ($12, cvs.com), which works in one minute to restore deeply damaged hair and even the most heat-trashed highlights; and Native Strengthening Hair Mask Almond & Shea Butter ($10, target.com), which rescues brittle hair from frizz in three to five minutes.

These light yet intensive formulas, and their short wait time, appeal to women with short crops and bobs who used to skip intensive conditioning, and also to women with long hair who like multitasking shower benefits.
