We Seem To Be Learning

There are about 200,000 earthquakes around the world each year, on average, about half of them strong enough to be felt. There are about 16 "major" (7.0 or greater) quakes per year.

But even a magnitude 6 to 7 ("strong") can cause, per Wikipedia, "damage to a moderate number of well-built structures in populated areas. Earthquake-resistant structures survive with slight to moderate damage. Poorly designed structures receive moderate to severe damage. Felt in wider areas; up to hundreds of kilometers from the epicenter. Strong to violent shaking in the epicentral area."

What's interesting is that there have been two strong quakes recently that caused no deaths: a 6.3 in central Columbia, and a 6.4 in northern Chile, which caused "minor infrastructure damage and cutting power to over 20,000 people," per AP.

Perhaps people are learning how to build earthquake-resistant structures.

Don't forget the earthquake drill

The annual Great American ShakeOut is scheduled for Thursday, October 16, at 10:16 a.m. Before that day you should check and make sure you have your OK/NEED HELP sign ready to put in your front window, as this will signal to your block captain that you are participating. On the appointed day all block captains will tour their assigned areas and check.

Speaking of block captains, we badly need some new recruits. If you would like to help keep your neighbors safe, contact Pete Cleaveland at pcleaveland@earthlink.net, 510-351-1742, or by mail at 481 Santa Monica and we'll give you everything you need.

据统计，全球每年大约发生 200,000 次地震，其中大约一半强度足以让人感觉到。每年约有 16 次为“重大”地震（震级 7.0 或以上）。

但即使是震级 6 到 7 的“强震”，也可能会造成显著破坏。根据维基百科的说法，这类地震可能会对人口稠密地区一些建造良好的建筑造成中度损坏。具备抗震设计的建筑可能只会受到轻微到中度的损伤，而设计不良的建筑则可能遭受中度到严重的破坏。震感可扩及震中几百公里范围，在震中区域可能产生强烈甚至剧烈的震动。

有趣的是，最近有两次强震并未造成任何人员死亡：一次是哥伦比亚中部发生的 6.3 级地震，一次是智利北部的 6.4 级地震，后者据美联社报道，仅造成“轻微的基础设施损坏，并导致超过 20,000 人断电”。

或许人们正在学会如何建造抗震建筑。

10 Keys to Grandparenting From a Distance

from Psychology Today

Managing the distance in long-distance relationships with grandchildren.

Key points

- Grandparent–grandchild relationships elevate the lives of each generation.
- Contemporary life can separate grandparents and grandchildren.
- Research on long-distance grandparenting encourages continuity, friendship, and focusing on recent events.

For most of human history, grandparents and grandchildren were close—geographically and emotionally. But today, long-distance grandparenting is becoming increasingly prevalent as grandparents and their grown children (and grandchildren) move away from each other for personal and professional opportunities.

How can grandparents and their grandchildren maintain their personal bonds over distance and time?

1. Forming Friendships. Research on grandparents and older grandchildren documents that both generations define the grandparent-grandchild relationship as a friendship based on mutual trust and shared confidence. Central to this intergenerational friendship is leniency on the part of the grandparents, which shows itself as the near-absence of moral judgments and criticism.

2. Staying Current. Grandparents stay engaged with their grandchildren by focusing on recent events in the grandchildren's lives.1

More specifically, a 2021 study at the University of Salzburg showed that young grandchildren were most interested in telling their grandparents about daily activities (reading, meals, hobbies, homework), favorite places (school, a park, a friend's house), and humorous incidents.

Interestingly, while grandchildren enjoy talking about everyday activities in their own lives, they're most intrigued about unexpected events in their grandparents' lives.

The Salzburg study also found that showing effectively augments telling. In video conversations, grandchildren enjoyed showing pets, books, toys, drawings, homemade food, and clothing. They were also eager to sing and play musical instruments for their grandparents.

3. Reminiscing Appropriately. With older grandchildren, reminiscing is welcome with two subjects: what they were like when they were infants and stories about their parents when their parents were kids.

In addition, when grandchildren have specific interests that align with past family events, grandparents can serve as valued resources for family history. In this case, the past is current. For example, my eldest granddaughter and I have talked at length about an uncle of mine who was a screenwriter because that fits into her ongoing passion for old movies.

4. Diversifying the Channels of Communication. The relationship between grandparents and grandchildren is strengthened when communication is carried out in multiple ways: phone calls, video chats, emails, cards, letters, and, if appropriate, texts.

Even with current technology, grandchildren continue to enjoy receiving cards and letters from their grandparents, and they especially appreciate small gifts at times other than birthdays or gift exchange holidays.

Sibling grandchildren can communicate together, but efforts should also be made to interact with each grandchild individually, particularly when sending cards and texting.

5. Talking About Learning. Younger grandchildren love talking with their grandparents about what they've learned—at school or preschool, during home activities with parents, or at extracurricular events. At this time in their lives, they are what they learn, and new ideas and skills are noteworthy.

6. Maintaining Continuity. When grandparents intentionally cultivate stability during their grandchildren's adolescence, relational closeness remains consistent and strong. Many grandparents naturally show patience with their grandchildren's adolescent difficulties because they know the turbulence will subside.

As grandchildren move through adolescence, the easy exchange of small messages in texts is particularly valuable for maintaining frequency and continuity. Over the lifespan of the grandparent-grandchild relationship, Facetime, Google Meet, Kinzoo Together, and Zoom support the long-distance relationship by providing immediacy and versatility.

In general, maintaining a long-term relationship with grandchildren requires being supportive of variability. It's not unusual for a grandchild to be very excited about a new project only to drop that project abruptly and start a new one.

7. Suspending Reciprocity. While reciprocity is something we normally expect in relationships, it's not necessary when communicating with grandchildren. It's okay to send unanswered cards. Even without responding, grandchildren appreciate the cards, which often become keepsakes.

8. Expanding the Effects of Visits. By continuing in-person activities remotely, visits can be extended after grandparents return home. My 4-year-old granddaughter and I currently have silly time on Google Meet as an extension of our in-person silly times during my last visit.

9. Savoring During Visits. When visiting, grandparents can actively savor even the smallest interactions with their grandchildren, approaching each experience the way a connoisseur tastes a new glass of wine. With devoted attention, grandparents immerse themselves in the interactions, feeling each one more fully. And later, after returning, they can savor the memories of their visit.

10. Attending to Sadness. Many long-distance grandparents experience undeniable moments of sadness at not seeing their grandchildren grow up. These moments are helpful reminders to reach out by calling, emailing, texting, video chatting, or sending cards and letters—staying close and current in the lives of their grandchildren.

Ways of Staying in Touch With Your Long Distance Grandchildren

by Lisa McKay, A Life Overseas

1. Visit when you can: This goes both ways. It's nearly as important for grandparents etc to visit the field as it is for grandchildren to visit relatives "at home". This helps grandkids feel that their grandparents have seen and understand "their" world. It also allows you to spend time together while the children are relaxed and at home, rather than when they are out of their element and busy meeting the myriad demands that come with holidays or home leave. Of course, it's important for children to visit their "home" country and everyone there as well. We visited Australia either annually or every two years while I was growing up, and that did a lot to help us feel connected to places and people there.

2. Help contribute to the cost of travel: My parents have a policy that's still in effect that they'll pay half of a return air-ticket to Australia for all of us (children, spouses, grandchildren) every year. This has helped us travel to spend time in Australia at times when we would have decided against it for financial reasons. This could go the other way, too. If you have parents or relatives that would love to visit but can't afford to, consider whether you could contribute to the cost of their travel. Encourage other friends and family members to help subsidize travel instead of buying other birthday or Christmas presents.

3. Blog: If you live far away from friends and family, think about keeping a family blog on which you post pictures of yourself and the children and share little stories about your lives. If you're worried about privacy you can easily set it up so that only approved people can log in and view it. This allows grandparents and extended family to easily keep up with photos and the like.

4. Send paper copies of photographs in both directions: If you have grandchildren overseas, send their parents photographs of yourself (especially photos of you with your grandchild). Ask the parents to show these photos to the children, or even display them where children can see them. When your grandchildren visit (or you visit them) think about making a scrapbook or photo-book full of pictures of things you've done together during the visit. This will help the children remember all the fun you've had. If you're the one raising children overseas send photos and videos home as you can, especially if you don't blog. There are few things that mean more to grandparents and siblings than photos of their grandchildren or nieces/nephews.

5. Send letter, postcards, cards, or packages: Children love to get mail of their own – send your grandkids letters, cards, photos, or packages addressed to them by post occasionally. Packages are especially exciting, and several small items usually go over better than packages containing one big item. Also consider sending some of your favorite children's books. If you have a copy of the same book on your end, you might even be able to read it to them via Skype at some point. You can also take a photo (of yourself or something they love) and have it made into a puzzle. Send them the puzzle to put together. Finally, if they're old enough to have their own email account, you can email them as well. From the other side, if you're the parent of children living overseas, help your kids draw pictures or write short letters or post-cards to send to their grandparents.

6. Involve children in some Skype or Facebook video calls: Make sure you involve your children in some (but not all) of your Skype or phone calls home. Schedule these "all family" calls for times when your kids are not likely to be too tired or hungry. Resist any temptation to make the calls extra long to make up for preceding weeks of no contact (you don't want to turn these calls into infrequent extended chores that children learn to dread). Use a webcam whenever internet bandwidth allows. Even if your computer doesn't have one build in, external webcams are cheap, easy to set up, and add enormously to the quality of the contact (if grandparents don't have webcams on their end, buy them one for Christmas and install it during a home visit). Consider making these calls a regular part of your routine (e.g., every second Saturday morning).

7. For those on the home front, recognize that children often freeze up or struggle to talk via telephone or computer. Help them by asking a couple (not dozens) of open-ended questions that require the children to give more than a simple yes or no answer. Give children time to come up with those answers after you ask a question – don't rush in too fast to fill pauses or silence, children may just be struggling to find some words. And try not to take it personally if your grandchild doesn't seem interested in talking to you on a particular call. Kids are going to be kids at times, whether they're on a special bi-monthly call with you or not.

Fashion dos and don'ts for dressing youthfully in your 60s and beyond - from Startsat60.com

As women, it can often feel like we are judged by society at every turn, especially when it comes to the way we present ourselves. But as we enter our 60s and 70s it can be hard to get the fashion transition right. Getting older doesn't mean you suddenly want (or need) to dress like a frumpy old lady – especially when you often still feel young (and fun) inside!

But how do we look youthful without going overboard and appearing as though we've raided our daughter (or granddaughter's!) wardrobe? It's a difficult balancing act, but there are plenty of over-60s women doing it well, and so can you. The key here is highlighting what you have instead of hiding it or, conversely, flood-lighting it!

"Working for Ralph Lauren changed my life. My experience working in the creative department, allowed me to learn and grow in several directions. My most valuable lesson? Accepting my own individual style. I left to start my own brand and never looked back." - Linda Wright, 77

Wear jeans

Jeans are always in fashion and can look great at any age – just make sure you get the right type for your shape. Trouser cut or boot-cut jeans in darker denims look better on larger women and, happily, a wider leg is on trend once again.

Avoid black near your face

You may have heard that black is slimming and appropriate for almost every occasion, but as women get older, skin becomes paler, meaning black can be the opposite of flattering near the face. It can emphasise wrinkles and dark shadows under the chin and around the eyes. Earthy colours such as olive, grey and brown can make a great neutral base instead of black. But if you love black and can't bear to part with it, consider adding a bright scarf or statement necklace around your neckline. (Black pants or skirts are still fine, of course.)

Wear less jewellery

Don't fall victim to the over-60s women's habit of wearing all your jewellery at once. Instead, focus on one statement piece with a few smaller accessories. Sounding like a rattle is not flattering, and it's not making you look younger either.

Add a scarf

A beautiful silk or cotton scarf with a modern pattern can do wonders for a plain outfit. It's effortlessly youthful and chic and can be worn day or night.

Avoid high heels
Sky-high heels are not making you look younger, they are doing the opposite (and probably aren't helping your feet or back either)! This is especially the case in recent years when flats have (finally!) become highly fashionable. Sneakers – especially plain white sneakers – have become a huge trend in the past 12-18 months and are being worn with everything. Pair them with long skirts and maxi dresses for an instant wardrobe update and evoke a more casual, modern vibe that's also super comfortable!

Dare to bare (a bit)
Just because your age is increasing doesn't mean your hemline has to fall. You might be trying to hide veins or lumps, but a long skirt can make women look wider and frumpier. To find the most flattering skirt length for your shape, look in the mirror and note the slimmest part of the area around your knee – it could be right above, right below or in the middle. This is where your hemline should hit.

Shop in places you never have before
One of the biggest mistakes mature women make is excluding themselves from stores that have a younger feel. No, the shop assistant won't look at you strangely and, no, she won't judge you! Have a browse, you might be surprised by what you find. Some of the cheaper clothing stores, such as Temt and Forever New, have some clothes that will suit any body shape or age, such as flowy skirts, basic tops, pretty dresses and chic three-quarter capri pants. Stores such as H&M have great basics, as well as a fantastic clothing recycling program that offers you a 15 per cent off discount card for every bag of items donated (which can be from any brand).

Diane von Furstenberg, 78

Pay attention to your hair
An outfit can go from fab to drab if your hair isn't looking great. Keep your hair as long as you want – if it's in good condition. If you have short hair, texture it with some styling product, but stay away from bows and headbands. For more hair tips and ideas, see our article on the most flattering hairstyles for women over 60.

And, above all, remember:
Always check in with yourself before you leave the house. Do you feel comfortable?
You don't have to spend a lot to look good, you just have to be smart about it.
Match old with new. Don't shy away from vintage clothing. Simply mix it with newer purchases for a more modern look.
Have a core wardrobe of neutral basics that you can liven up with scarves, jackets and accessories.
Keep a collection of your favourite looks that you can refer to for inspiration when shopping.
Shop online to find great looks and/or see what's out there – especially if you're put off by pushy sales assistants.

Social Security's insolvency date is now a year earlier. Here's how it could impact your benefits.

By Aimee Picchi, CBS News

Social Security is on track to deplete its trust funds by 2034, one year sooner than previously forecast, when the federal retirement program will be required to cut monthly benefits by about 20%.

The new projection, issued Wednesday in the Social Security Board of Trustees' annual report, is partly due to increased costs from the Social Security Fairness Act, which boosted benefits for millions of retirees, the report said. Last year's report had forecast that the program would need to cut benefits starting in 2035, impacting Social Security's 70 million beneficiaries.

The Social Security program has been staring down a financial crunch for years, although the trust funds' depletion date can change from year to year due to fluctuations in the economy and the number of beneficiaries. The trust fund is slated to be depleted partly due to the wave of baby boomer retirements and an aging U.S. population, which means its reserves are drawing down because spending is outpacing income.

"Congress, along with the Social Security Administration and others committed to eliminating waste, fraud and abuse, must work together to protect and strengthen the trust funds for the millions of Americans who rely on it — now and in the future — for a secure retirement or in the event of a disability," said Frank Bisignano, commissioner of Social Security, in a statement.

Here's the impact on your benefits

Even if the trust funds are depleted — which may not occur if Congress makes changes to how the program is funded, for instance — benefits won't suddenly disappear.

Instead, Social Security beneficiaries would see a cut of between 19% to 23% to their benefits, the report said.

The current average Social Security benefit for a retiree stands at $1,976, which means a 19% reduction would take their monthly check down to about $1,600.

The new report is a wake-up call that lawmakers need to move quickly to shore up the program, some advocacy groups for seniors said on Wednesday.

"Congress must act to protect and strengthen the Social Security that Americans have earned and paid into throughout their working lives," said AARP CEO Myechia Minter-Jordan in an email. "More than 69 million Americans rely on Social Security today and as America's population ages, the stability of this vital program only becomes more important."

Shoring up Social Security

There are two ways to shore up Social Security, by either raising more revenue or cutting benefits, said Nancy Altman, president of Social Security Works, an advocacy group for the program, in an email. "Any politician who doesn't support increasing Social Security's revenue is, by default, supporting benefit cuts," she said.

One method of raising more revenue for the program would be lift its income cap, which stands at $176,100. Earnings over that amount are exempt from the payroll tax, which funds Social Security.

"In poll after poll, the American people are clear that they strongly support making the wealthy pay their fair share into Social Security, and overwhelmingly oppose benefit cuts," Altman said.

Some Republican lawmakers have suggested increasing the retirement age to as high as 70 as a way to fix the program's finances, but that would effectively act as a benefits cut for retirees, said Max Richtman, CEO of National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare, an advocacy group, in a statement.

"Current and future seniors (nearly 50% of whom rely on their benefits for all or most of their income) — should not be asked to bear the cost of improving the program's finances," he added.

Changes to Social Security

One of the changes to Social Security this year that will have a "substantial" impact on the program is the Social Security Fairness Act, which went into effect on January 5, the report said.

The Social Security Fairness Act expanded benefits for millions by eliminating two federal policies that barred employees with a public pension from collecting their full benefits under the federal retirement program. Those same policies also reduced benefits for such workers' surviving spouses and family members.

Under the new law, about 3.2 million recipients are getting higher benefits, ranging from modest increases to more than $1,000 a month in additional money, the agency has said.

Americans are also filing for Social Security benefits at a record rate this year, the program's data shows. The number of people claiming benefits jumped 17% to 1.8 million in 2025 through May versus the same period a year earlier, putting the program on track to enroll 4 million new beneficiaries in 2025.

The spike in early benefits claims comes as the Trump administration has slashed jobs at the agency and made other changes at the Social Security Administration, which had already been struggling to provide services to retirees, disabled people and survivors of deceased workers who rely on the program.

Anxieties about the stability of the program likely prompted some of the new filings, experts have told CBS MoneyWatch.

Medicare's outlook

Separately, the Medicare Board of Trustees issued a report mid June that said the health insurance program for people over 65 is facing a financial crunch in 2033, at which point it wouldn't be able to pay 100% of benefits.

Instead, the program's revenues would only cover 89% of its costs at that point, the report said.

"Medicare provides essential coverage for millions of American seniors, but this year's report underscores the urgent need for serious, sustained reform to secure its long-term future," CMS Administrator Dr. Mehmet Oz said in a statement.

Here's a practical playbook for retirees to brace for potential Social Security benefit cuts projected around 2034

STRATEGY	WHY IT HELPS
Review and trim expenses	Small cuts—like switching Medicare plans or canceling unused subscriptions—can free up cash
Create a detailed budget	Knowing where every dollar goes helps you prioritize essentials and spot savings opportunities
Explore part-time or gig work	Even light work can supplement income and reduce reliance on Social Security
Downsize or tap home equity	Selling a larger home or using a reverse mortgage can unlock funds for future needs
Delay claiming Social Security	Waiting until age 70 boosts your monthly check by up to 77% compared to claiming at 62
Use a "bridge strategy"	Fund early retirement years with savings so you can delay Social Security and maximize benefits
Rebalance your portfolio	Shift toward income-generating or tax-efficient investments to stretch retirement savings
Stay informed and advocate	Track legislation and consider contacting your representatives to support Social Security reform
